out and just the library is opened, well, that's like building an apartment without a kitchen, and saying you have to go to another building for the kitchen," said Ali Zamani, acting treasurer of the student government.

Plans for a Mount Vernon campus have been on the drawing boards since 1967, but those plans consistently were reduced ever since an initial $9.7 million was spent to purchase the four-square-block site and clear the homes of 183 familes and 16 stores.

The biggest stumbling block was Leahy, who accused UDC officials of having an "edifice complex" for proposing to construct another campus at a time when the school's enrollment was declining. Students branded Leahy, who supported expansion of the Van Ness site, a racist for his stand.

It also became an important issue for the city government, which supported the Mount Vernon expansion and felt the Senate subcommittee was usurping the District of Columbia's home rule prerogatives by vetoing the Mount Vernon project. In the end, when the final proposal for the Mount Vernon construction plan came to a vote last August, Leahy was in the minority of senators who voted for it.

Why did the university go ahead with the restoration of the library when Congress began questioning the need for the overall campus? Critics of the university say school officials thought it would give them leverage needed to get Congress to release the funds for the overall campus.

"I don't think there was any of that at all," said Ford. Noting that plans for the downtown campus were more than 10 years old, Ford said, "We were just proceeding in good faith" that Congress would appropriate the funds.
